Another Reason For Deadlock

(The New York Times)

After two weeks of debate the Security Council of the United Nations has not yet taken up the first item on its agenda. The discussion is still "procedural," which, in nonparliamentary language, means simply that the Soviet representative is still trying to put the Soviet order of business before the Council rather than the order upon which all the other members are agreed. It has often been suggested that the Soviet motive in so doing is pure obstructionism based on the desire to prevent, if possible, any further Council action on the aggression against Free Korea. In Friday's debate, however, Sir Gladwyn Jebb, representing the United Kingdom, shrewdly put his finger squarely upon a further motive for the Soviet action.

He called attention to the Soviet theory of "state infallibility," under which nothing that the Kremlin has decided upon can possibly be wrong. This accounts for the Russian interpretation of the principle of "unanimity," that is, the use of the veto, to mean that all the rest of the United Nations must agree with the Soviet Union or have its decisions nullified. The "procedural" questions now before the Council are not subject to veto and therefore the Soviet representative is attempting to nullify the will of the Council by his persistent refusal to abide by the rules of order of the Council.

This idea of the Kremlin's infallibility (and presumably Mr. Malik knows what punishment he would face if he departed from it) helps to account for the singular spectacle in the Security Council. It makes it possible to understand why a presumably intelligent man, talking to other presumably intelligent persons, can with a straight face insist for two weeks that war is peace, that self-defense is aggression, that night is day and that black is white.

ANOTHER GUBERNATORIAL ASPIRANT?

(Editorial in The Roanoke Times, 31st July, 1950)

Lieutenant Governor L. Preston Collins, representing the Virginia State Administration, scored a hit last Thursday with the several hundred business men and industrialists attending the dedication ceremonies of the west Philip Sporn electric generating plant of the Appalachian Electric and Ohio Power Companies. The Lieutenant-Governor, in a two-minute extemporaneous talk, made these three quick points:

He said that the plant, the greatest engineering feat of its kind in the world today, stands as a tribute to what can be accomplished by industrial effort under a form of government that permits free enterprise.

He spoke out against advocates of a kind of government that would destroy free enterprise.

And he told his listeners that Virginians are determined to preserve the American system of democratic government.

The applause that punctuated his remarks attested to the enthusiasm with which they were received. As a matter of fact, he almost stole the show from West Virginia's Governor Okey L. Patteson. Governor Patteson paid passing tribute to the free enterprise system, but concentrated his remarks mainly on West Virginia's industrial accomplishments and upon the economic asset that the Sporn plant will add to the Mountain State.

Mr. Collins elaborated on his views that evening in an impromptu talk to about two score Virginia business men at a dinner. His two performances gave rise to considerable speculation that he has joined the ranks of potential candidates for the Virginia Governorship succeeding John S. Battle.

Twice Lieutenant Governor Mr. Collins has many friends throughout the State. He may prove to be a strong contender for "organization" support, although he may have to overcome potent opposition from Representative Thomas B Stanley of the Fifth District and Attorney General J. Lindsay Almond, Jr. Still another organization Democrat, State Senator Charles R. Fenwick of Arlington, is also in the gubernatorial picture.

"Pat" Collins may not get the organization's blessing, but he gets around the State a good deal and makes a good impression. He must be reckoned with in any speculation about the gubernatorial primary just three short years off.

The Worst Highway Offense of Them All

(The Durham Morning Herald)

Exceeding the speed limit on the highways or streets of the State may be an offense that most of the citizenry commits at one time or another. But deliberate high speed for speed's sake is another thing. And racing on the highways is the worst offense of all. One who offends in this manner is utterly without excuse and there is grave question that once caught, he should ever be allowed to operate a motor vehicle on the highways again. His personal conveniences is not equal to the danger he creates.

HOMEMAKERS' ITEMS

You don't need a fireplace to enjoy outdoor cookery—though it's a big help. Food specialists at V. P. I. recommend borrowing one or two steel racks from the family oven. They can be supported over sturdy rocks, bricks, or green forked sticks driven into the ground. Prepare a bed of glowing coals from either wood or charcoal as the first step toward broiled, fried, or barbecued dishes.

Bedspread is chiefly used for decoration—and to protect the blankets. But when its tattered, old, and faded it loses its decorative function. Before you discard the spread, think about these suggestions from home economists at V. P. I. The specialists think the worn-out spread may become a bath mat. Here's how: Cut the spread into convenient sizes and sew two thicknesses together. If the bedspread is not too heavy, it could be made up into garment bags to protect dresses. The leftover scraps can be used for cleaning and mop cloths.

Here's a suggestion from V. P. I. for saving on dishwashing. Use only one spoon to stir all foods at the range or stove. You'll keep your surface clean if you place the spoon in a bowl of warm water between stirrings. Then as soon as you have finished using all cooking utensils, wash them out. Put cold water in utensils which held egg and starch mixtures, and hot water in those that held fats and sugars.

Marketing of Pigs Will Begin Early

Marketing from the spring pig crop probably will begin earlier than usual this year.

George Herring, animal husbandman at V. P. I., says the June pig survey showed more early-farrowed pigs than in recent years; and that good feed supplies on hand on most farms have made it possible to push pigs along rapidly. Another factor is that hogs are being sold at somewhat lighter weights.

During the last half of the year, hog prices usually reach their peak sometime between late July and early September with a rather steady decline to the low point in September. The average decline over a period of years is near 18 per cent from the high to the low point. Herring said the seasonal decline probably will occur this year.

GAMBLING IN HOME CANNING DOES NOT PAY, SAY THE EXPERTS

Gambling in home canning does not pay—and that's putting it mildly, home canning specialists of the U. S. Department of Agriculture say. They explain that any housewife who is going to the trouble and time of canning should make sure that all equipment is in best condition, that she uses fresh food of good quality and follows the most up-to-date directions.

Housewives sometimes are tempted to save a penny here and there by using imperfect jars or lids. That's hazardous. Any jar with the slightest crack or chip should be discarded because these defects may prevent an airtight seal and thus lead to spoilage. The same is true of lids with dented or spread edges, or masonry type caps with loose or cracked linings.
